To help future students find programs attended by like-minded individuals, please choose the profile that most closely represents you.

The Academic or Linguist

You went abroad with specific academic goals in mind; the program credentials and rigor of your coursework abroad were very important to you. You had a great time abroad, but never lost sight of your studies and (if applicable) were diligent with your foreign language study. Good for you!

The Outright Urbanite

A social butterfly, you're happiest in bustling cities with hip people, and took advantage of all it had to offer. You enjoyed the nightlife, and had fun going out dancing, and socializing with friends. Fun-loving and dressed to the nines, you enjoyed discovering new restaurants, shops, cafes, and bars in your host country.

The Networker

An active student leader, it was important for you to network abroad as well. Once overseas, you sought out student clubs, volunteered with local organizations, or attended community events. You encouraged your friends join you, and often considered how you could reflect your international experiences in a resume.

 The Nearly Native or Trail Blazer

Craving the most authentic experience possible, perhaps you lived with a host family or really got in good with the locals. You may have felt confined by your program requirements and group excursions. Instead, you'd have preferred to plan your own trips, even skipping class to conduct your own 'field work.'

 The Avid Adventurer

The wardrobe you packed was better suited for a semester of camping than club hopping. Outdoorsy, you might forgo a crazy night out for an early all-day adventure. You'd rather take in the rich culture of an old town than the metropolis of a modern city, but for you getting off the grid is ideal.

This document is a replica the core Abroad101 online review form, and is offered to encourage universities to participate in this standard program evaluation. As a standard set, these questions also give advisors and providers a means to benchmark their students against other institutions and programs. In the spirit of creating best practice in the field, Abroad101 offers these time-tested questions as a template for anyone looking to establish a review process for education abroad. We hope that you will use our free tool to manage your evaluation process and invite you to work with Abroad101 to advance study abroad.

Abroad101 also offers institutions the opportunity to add custom questions, in addition to the core set.
